To make way for Crossrail's Liverpool Street east ticket hall we are diverting the utilities in Liverpool Street. The next stage is the construction of a new utilities corridor, to the south of the existing hoarding of the Crossrail Liverpool Street worksite (as shown on enclosed sketch). Work in the footpath along the frontage of 1-14 Liverpool Street will be carried out in stages, initially from the Blomfield Street end, and will commence in February 2012. Access to the affected premises will be maintained during the working week from either end. In February 2012 there will be intermittent footpath closures and from March 2012 there will be no through route on the footpath for pedestrians.

The utilities corridor construction involves in principle a line of large bored piles within the worksite compound which form both the north wall of the utilities corridor plus eventually the south side of the Crossrail Liverpool Street ticket hall, with a smaller line of piles forming the south wall of the utilities corridor alongside the building at 1-14 Liverpool Street.

A piling rig approximately 25 metres high (assisted by a crane) will bore the cased circular piles, which are up to 36 metres deep, within the Liverpool Street work site in March and April 2012. A smaller rig approximately 3 metres high will auger the 18 metre deep piles for the south wall of the utilities corridor directly alongside 1-14 Liverpool Street. It is anticipated that these works will result, on average, in 10 lorry movements per working day.

Also at the Blomfield Street work site shaft excavation and substation construction are in progress. These works are located at low level alongside the Circle / Hammersmith & City underground lines. The shaft itself is 12 metres deep.
